

The United States is the country known as having the best workforce. With unlimited knowledge, experience, self-development, and more, the workforce in the United States of America is important to society. From my eyes the biggest impact that working in the union creates is how much it avails families.

Being a part of a union does not just mean that you have a job, being a part of the union means that you have a plan. Whether that plan is to have and support a family or to be financially stable on your own, being a part of the union is very beneficial. Labor unions entitle the workers to earn a better living by forcing the employers to share their profits, unlike nonunion businesses. This leads to higher wages for employees in the Unions. Unions ensure that workers and their families attain health care, social security, job security, and a stable career that will help sustain a family's needs. When raising a family, the unknown can be scary when it comes to these serious matters. Therefore presenting that labor unions provide better living conditions for workers than non-union glazing companies. With more workers in labor unions, this would mean that more families would be able to live comfortably and not worry about paying for bills or safety. Growing up I was able to see how much effort my dad put into his career and the effect it had on our family. Being stressed about things like paying for bills, getting the health care we needed at unexpected times or even just paying for daily activities was something our family avoided. This was all due to the career my dad had, and I am forever grateful for everything he has provided for our family.

Furthermore, when acknowledging the importance of labor workers, one may ask what is the difference between non-union and union. It is simple; Non-union workers are more likely to have a closer connection to their employer because of the size of the small business, but being a union worker ultimately is the smartest choice for employees who not only want to be financially stable but also comfortable knowing they have a career that will keep challenging their workers to do better. This being said, when consumers look for companies who can do business for them, it is more than likely that one would look for the best work for the lowest price, but a well-known quote utilized by union workers depicts that this mindset could lead someone to a wrong choice: "Skilled work isn't cheap, and cheap work isn't skilled." This quote emphasizes the importance of union work because although the prices are on average higher than non-union prices, the quality of union work is exceptionally better than the work presented by non-union workers.

Although being a part of the union has many responsibilities, the benefits undoubtedly outweigh the loss. Labor workers are skilled, trained, and held accountable for their actions, but this responsibility allows someone to grow within themselves and the company. The responsibility ensures that employees keep themselves in check and put in the effort in their career to keep the company's reputation looking good. A worry about more workers being a part of the union is the chance of inflation. Although inflation may occur because of the amount of high-paying careers offered within the union, it is overall beneficial because inflation may occur either way and this would ensure that those who are working for a better life can receive one. Without unions, the employers and employees would be more divided by social status as seen in non-union labor businesses. This is where the employer gets paid much more than the employees and takes responsibility for their work as well. By employers taking responsibility for the employees' mistakes, it demonstrates the difference between work ethic between the union and non-union workers, because non-union doesn't have to put in as much effort and can get away with it. Labor unions prevent this socioeconomic status barrier by giving each employee potential to make high-paying salaries. More people in labor unions would mean more excellent futures for all workers of America.

Overall, I am very grateful to have a dad in the union and can see how beneficial it is not only to our family and others in the union but for the United States. With more workers joining the union, it ensures that more families are financially stable and that the people can live better lives. Therefore, it would be important for the United States if more workers joined labor unions to ensure that lives improve for everyone.
